
ABSTRACT

Therefore, with regard to the legal problems on the solution of prostitution, it does not mean that Thailand lacks enforceable laws for existing problems. The true problem is that the applicable laws regarding the prostitution business are not in conformity with the social reality. This in turn leads to the problems of the evasion of laws and their inefficient enforcement. Therefore, attempts to solve the problem of prostitution have not been as successful as they should be.

The researcher is of opinion that in order to redress the problem of prostitution, regulations and laws must be amended and enforced simultaneously. In the meanwhile, the problem must also be solved based on its root cause. The amendments of regulations and laws related thereto are at the terminus of the problem. An attempt to redress the problem will not meet with success if only legal measures are taken because there are flaws not only in the legal provisions but also in practice. The problem solution is always unsuccessful as, in the reality, law is one of measures which are integrated into the measure to prevent and suppress the business of prostitution, a business affecting the economic system and the future development of the country.
