ABSTRACT

The objective of this research is to form a model law for the prevention and suppression of terrorism. Research methodology is data collection and analysis, qualitative research and document research, in-depth interview, participation design, co-design, and listening to opinions.

The research found that Thailand has several laws on preventing and suppressing terrorism. The provision of such laws has unclear content, which is confusion among law enforcement officers. Moreover, they are unable to enforce existing laws effectively. Therefore, action must bring together a single law on terrorism. Furthermore, it should be a law that can prevent and suppress terrorism effectively and under international principles. The research created a model law for the prevention and suppression of terrorism. The legal structure consists of 10 chapters and 43 sections.

The research recommends that the model law on prevention and suppression of terrorism should enact according to this research's legal structure.
